It's not the first time the technology has been used in video games, but it's more detailed than ever, and it's real people playing, not cloned muscle movements in a studio. EA says it was inspired by the VAR technology used in the real-life World Cup, and it has given them the performance edge they need to become the best football game on any platform. As part of FIFA this year, EA has also updated the training feature, giving you the flexibility of customizing your training based on your own actions. Although there are 60 training modes, a brand new Pro Evo coaching feature allows you to give real-time feedback to your players. There's also vastly improved player AI and new player controls for dribbling and shooting, which are arguably the most important parts of football. FIFA 22 will be released worldwide on
