Unlimited number of floors with GOLD PLUS version (depends on your device). How can I make a draggable div to work on a website that uses iframes to display webpages? I've been trying to make a div draggable for a project but I can't figure it out. This is my code so far, yet my browser can not drag the div. Any ideas why?

```
$(document).ready(function(){ $('bodyB').mouseenter(function(){ $(this).css({'cursor': 'pointer'}); }); $('bodyB').mouseleave(function(){ $(this).css({'cursor': 'default'}); }); $('bodyB').mousemove(function(){ $(this).css({'cursor': 'move'}); }); $('bodyB').on("dragstart", function() { $(this).css({'cursor': 'move'}); }); $('bodyB').draggable({ containment: 'body', cursor: 'move' }); });
```

 The class that I use is created using `on('click'...)` so I could not have problem with it being a tag and the target being other tags. A: I've got it to work. Looks like it had to do with how I was calling it. Heres my new code and it works perfectly.

```
$(document).ready(function(){ $('bodyB').mouseenter(function(){ $(this).css({'cursor': 'pointer'...
```

Repairs negative features, and resume production when Apple hit with patent lawsuit over touch ID features Share this article: Share Tweet Share Share Share Email Share Washington — Apple Inc. has been hit with a suit over its new iPhone X that was unveiled by the U.S. International Trade Commission last month. The lawsuit, filed at the ITC on Friday, argues that the iPhone X violates a device patent owned by a company called Touch ID Holdings Inc. The lawsuit was filed against Apple, which makes most of the components of the iPhone, under grounds of patent infringement and unfair competition. In the suit, Touch ID alleges that Apple infringes on its "Method and Apparatus for User Identification," which covers authentication procedures for fingerprint scanners on devices. The lawsuit filed also mentioned that it was the first patent to be filed on Apple's biometrics technology on its iPhone devices. According to the lawsuit filed, Touch ID has been selling "Touch ID-equipped devices" to large tech companies, including Amazon.com Inc. and Google Inc., and is also a licensee of a patent granted to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and SRI International. "The asserted patents describe a system for authenticating users of devices. The iPhone includes a Fingerprint Scanner ("FPS") system that comprises a small fingerprint sensor embedded in a display. An FPS
