However, there remains a need for simple, inexpensive cleaning methods and apparatus that will effectively clean and degrease a variety of materials without adversely affecting or causing damage to the material being cleaned. Examples of the need for such methods and apparatus are found in a variety of industrial applications, including the cleaning of steel parts prior to the application of coating materials. In the assembly of vehicles, it is necessary to clean parts so that they may be easily cleaned in preparation for coating and painting of the vehicle exterior. Further, in preparation of a vehicle for the repair process it is necessary to clean the vehicle's interior to remove dirt, oil, grease and other contaminants from the interior prior to repainting of the vehicle's interior. Vehicle owners, through both governmental means and private businesses, are increasingly utilizing the services of car washes. Car washes are generally divided into two types, a traditional car wash and a pressure car wash. Traditional car washes are powered by a large rotating brush, generally located above the car wash. Generally, these large brushes have a built-in water system and a pressure sprayer. Thus, all the liquids used in the car wash are provided with water and are powered by a pressure source, typically water pumps. Pressure car washes are designed to clean cars in a more effective manner, using a combination of liquids, which are generally chemically-based and under pressure. These systems provide for a more efficient washing of a vehicle, and are ca3bfb1094
