ID Software was founded in 1991 by John Carmack and Adrian Carmack, John Carmack and David Doane with the goal of making revolutionary gaming experiences and one of the first three-dimensional (3D) rendering game engines ever made. Their first work in this field was Commander Keen, a two-dimensional platform game in which the player attempts to escape from a martian base, following a bouncing ball through five stages and reaching the final stage where the player's ship becomes teleported to Mars. The game used a 3D "bresenham line" algorithm to solve pathfinding problems and was the first graphical game to feature the same patented 3D line algorithm that would later be used in Wolfenstein 3D, which was already being developed at the same time. In 1992, John Carmack became Technical Director of the Programmer Resources Group, a division of their company focusing on developing proprietary hardware and software. The first few games developed by the group were
