First, apologies for such a simple question, but what is a good example of a shared memory object on Linux, using a POSIX API? The typical answer is shmget() or shm_open(), but that doesn't really help me understand what I am doing. I just learned that the pthread API permits me to create and share memory. That sounds good, but I haven't found a good example. So, if this isn't a good example, then what is? A: Here is an example for shared memory. The main program creates a shared memory segment (of 1MB) for this example. Then it forks two child processes, one that will read and one that will write to it. //test.c #include #include #include #include #include #include //shared memory segment for the shared region //from shared memory region to the parent region #define SHARED_REGION_SIZE 100 #define SHARED_REGION_ADDRESS "shared:region" int shared 6d1f23a050
