Screenhero's one line IP video update - nildan ===== gordian This appears to work a little better than a chromecasting of the browser, with the screen and microphone shared to the guest. It does however suffer from some very low resolution videos (720p), since it doesn't transmit the video stream and instead paints the video window in the browser. It also has some other limitations which might be things you don't want to deal with. For example the hardware doesn't allow to click within the video window, and it doesn't let you drag around the remote's window. This is a really interesting solution to a fundamental problem with the web: that we are bounded to computer displays and if you are running a bigger screen it is difficult to watch videos. ~~~ yareally >It appears to work a little better than a chromecasting of the browser, with the screen and microphone shared to the guest. Chromecasting is not a browser plugin but an app built directly into Chrome for the purpose of allowing video conferencing. I was actually planning on building something like this but using Chromecasts (however with an app rather than a Chrome plugin). Screenhero's technique is probably going to work a lot better since you are running a desktop program and your browser is already a very capable video player. I like the idea though since streaming video across the desktop and mobile could be a real game changer in terms of remote work. ~~~ gordian I don't use chromecasting. ~~~ yareally >I don't use chromecasting. Okay, perhaps that's the only reason 6d1f23a050
